Depth Study: The USA, 1919–1941

WHY WAS PROHIBITION INTRODUCED, AND THEN LATER REPEALED?

The arguments for Repeal that seemed to have the greatest significance with voters in 1932 and 1933 centred not on indulgence, but on economic recovery. Repeal, it was argued, would replace the tax revenues lost under Prohibition, thereby allowing governments to provide relief to suffering families. It would put unemployed workers back to work. Prohibitionists had long encouraged voters to believe in a link between Prohibition and prosperity, and after the onset of the Depression they were further proved wrong in the elections. Voters who had ignored the problems caused by Prohibition, such as excessive centralization of power, failure to stop drinking, crime increase, and elected the dry Hoover, now voted for the wet Franklin Roosevelt. They also turned out to elect delegates who pledged to Repeal the Twenty-First Amendment. Thus, it was not the strict nature of National Prohibition which set a goal that was probably impossible to reach, instead a sudden and major impact of the Depression killed Prohibition.

At the beginning Prohibition was highly popular. A strong women's movement believed that Prohibition would benefit children and the family. At the same time, most Protestant churches also began to preach that drinking alcohol was undesirable, even sinful. The combination of the women's and religious movements was powerful. By the time Prohibition went into effect, the vast majority of people supported it. But the effects of prohibition were far from what temperance activists promised. The beautiful dream soon turned into a nightmare. Prohibition created a demand for illegal alcohol that criminals could sell at high prices. This gave birth to organized crime. Gangs controlled the production, transportation and selling of alcohol, in the process corrupting public officials. Speakeasies owned by gangsters replaced neighbourhood bars, and promoted heavy drinking, gambling, and prostitution. Thus the 'Noble Experiment' had to be abandoned, but it serves as an excellent example of a public policy based on hopes and desires. Not on logic and common sense.

Prohibition lasted from 1920 until 1933. It is often said that Prohibition was a total failure. This is not entirely correct. Levels of alcohol consumption fell about 30 percent in the 1920s. Prohibition gained widespread approval in some states, particularly the rural areas in the mid-west, although in urban states it was not popular. The government ran information campaigns and Prohibition agents arrested offenders. Two of the most famous agents were Isadore Einstein and his deputy Moe Smith. They made 4392 arrests. Their raids were always low key. They would enter speakeasies and simply order a drink. Einstein had a special flask hidden inside his waist coat with a funnel attached. He preserved the evidence by pouring his drink down the funnel and the criminals were caught.

It may be a mistake; the people of the United States may have erred in their judgment. Time and experience alone will demonstrate that fact. But it was not a crime; the people of the United States were genuinely struggling with alcoholism which was considered one of the greatest evils of modern civilization. I am not against the modification or even the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment. If there be a better way to control the evil of drink, a more effective way, more thorough, and with better results to those whom we would serve, let us have it.

An extract from an influential Republican Senator, William Borah's speech at a Prohibition debate in Congress in 1929.

Alcohol abuse is bound up with crime, with insanity and, only too often, with poverty. It is increasingly apparent that the extreme use of intoxicants has no place in this new mechanized civilization of ours. In our industry, in our recreation, on our highways, a drunken man is more than an objectionable companion; he is a hazard to the rest of us. At the same time, Prohibition has also been accompanied in most parts of the country by complete and tragic failure. A general encouragement of lawlessness has resulted in corruption, hypocrisy, crime and disorder, and instead of restricting, we have extended the spread of overindulgence. This failure has come for this very good reason: Prohibition has depended too largely upon the power of governmental action instead of recognizing the authority of the home and that of the churches in controlling alcohol abuse.

Democratic Presidential candidate, Franklin D. Roosevelt speaking on Prohibition in Sea Girt, New Jersey, 27 August 1932.
